Her grandmother had made her a red cloak with a hood, and she wore it every single day, and would not take it off even for dinner.
So everybody called her Little Red Riding Hood.

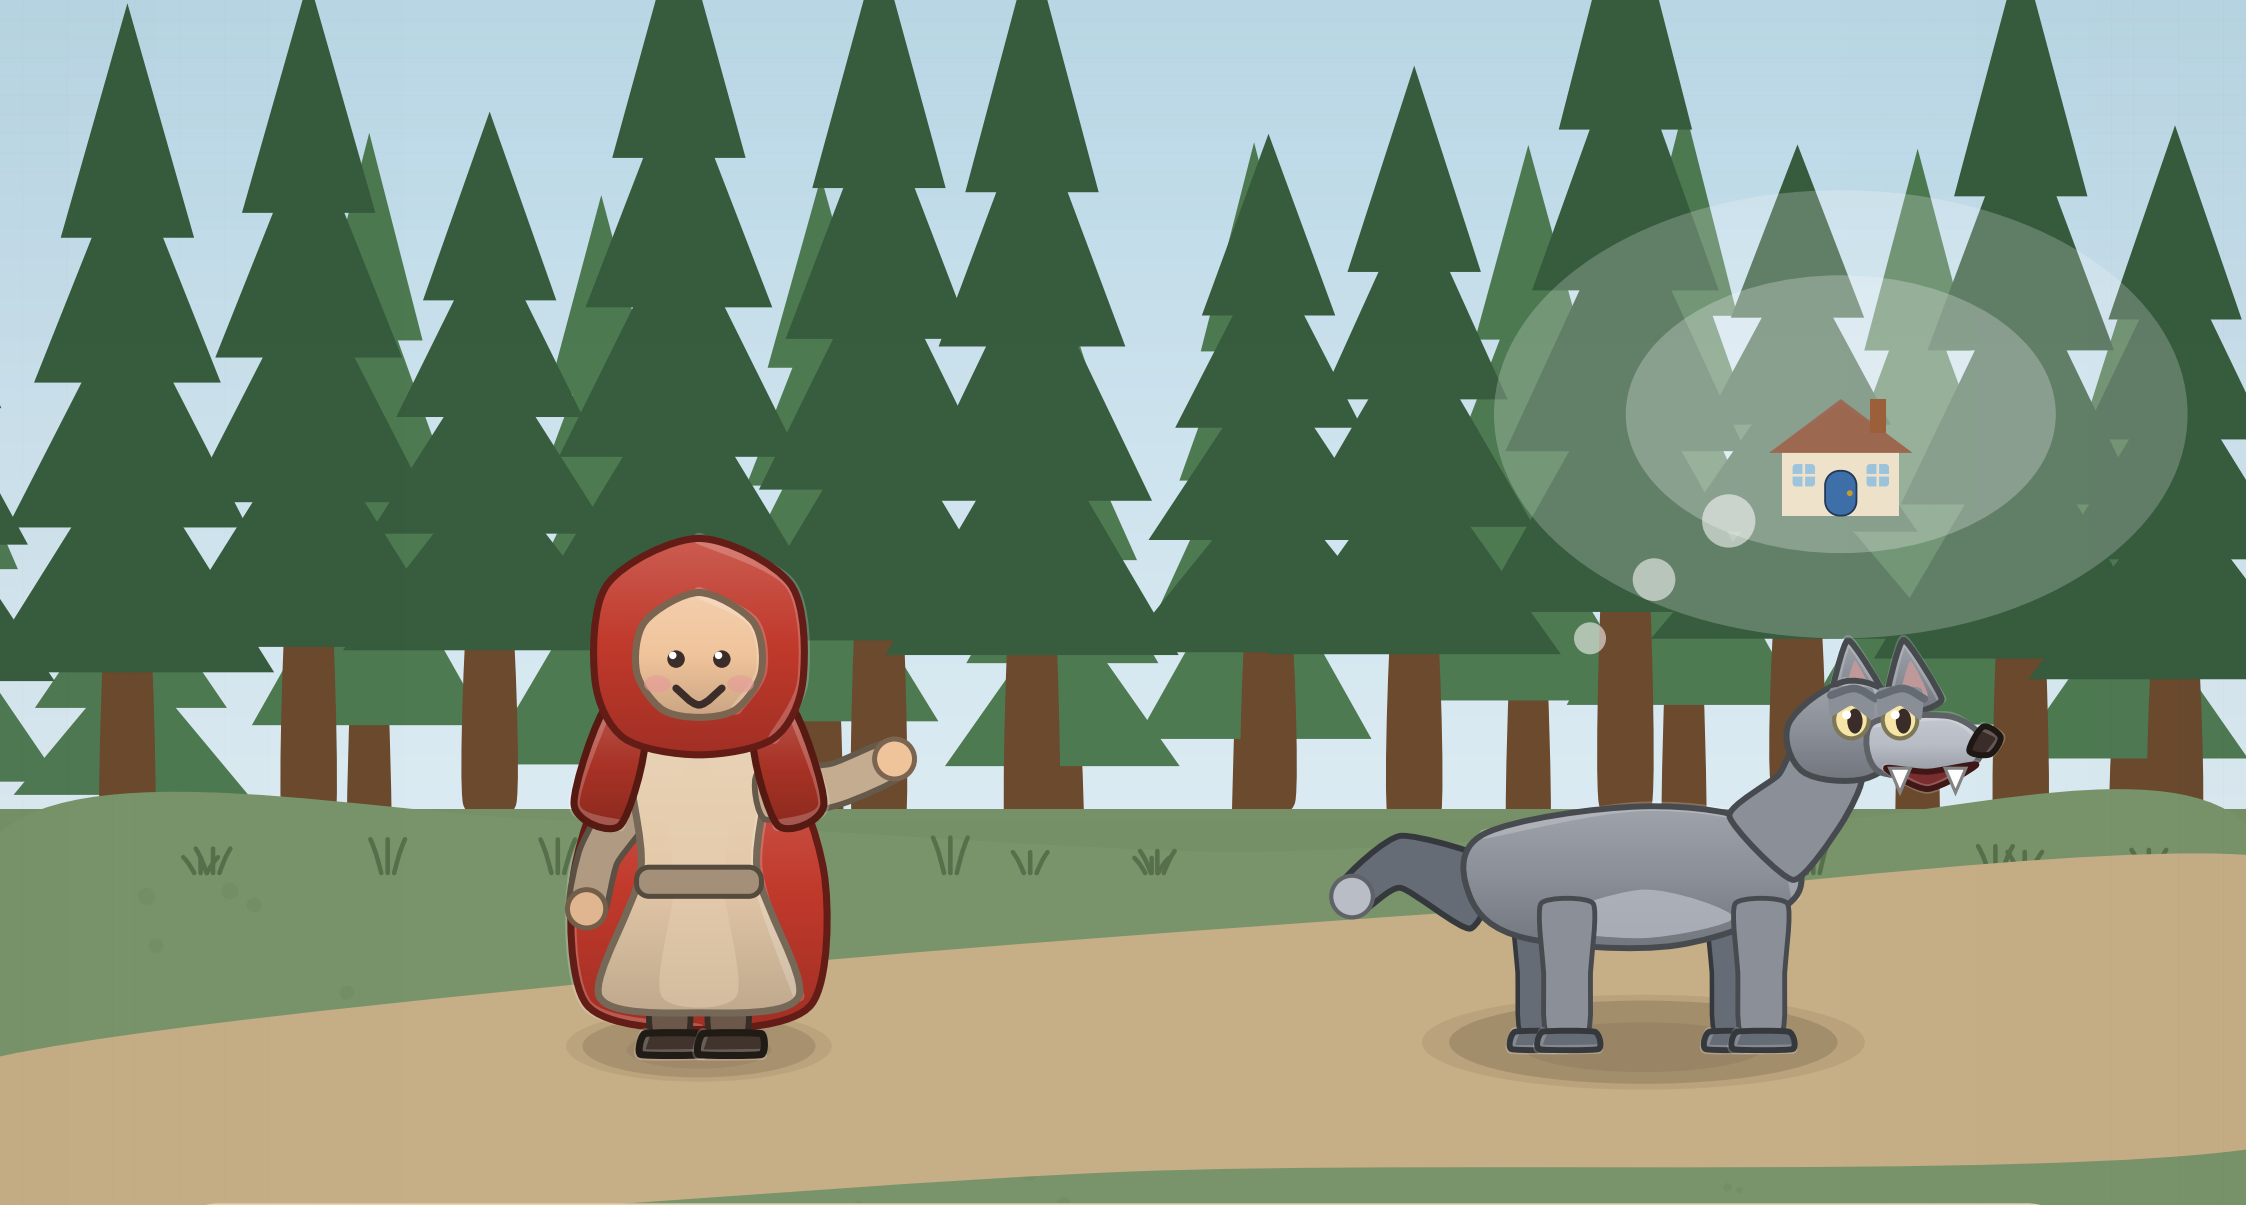

“Grandma is poorly,” said her mother one morning. “Take her this cake and this little pot of butter.
And Red — stay on the path.”

“I will,” said Red, and off she went into the wood, swinging the basket, with the trees going up and up on either side like the pillars of a church.

Halfway along, somebody stepped out from behind an oak.
“Good morning,” said the Wolf, in his politest voice. “And where are we off to today?”

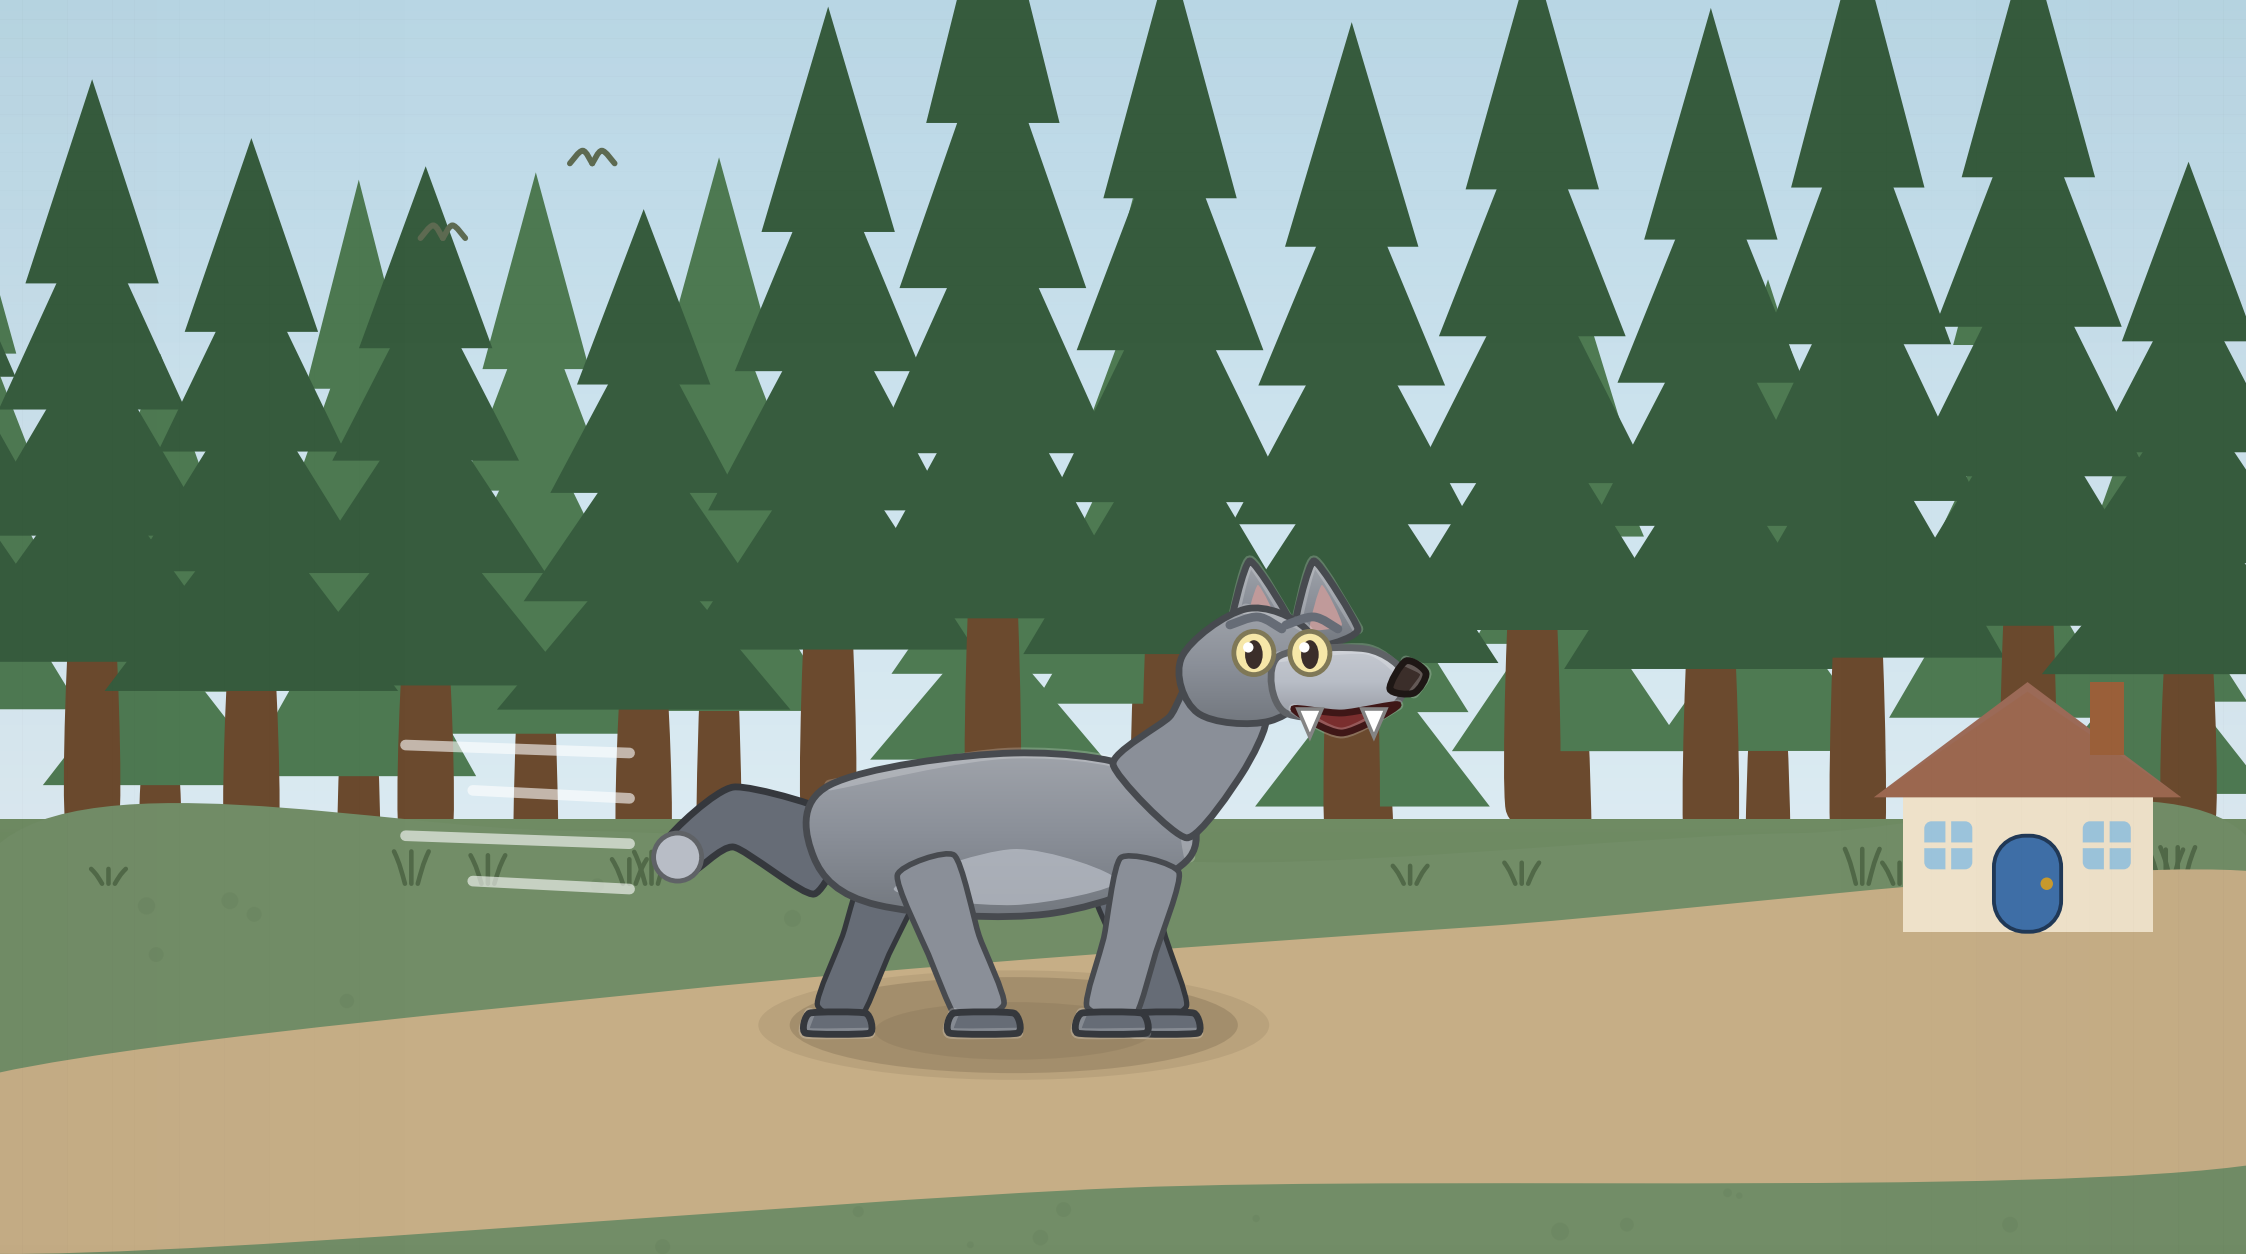

“To my grandmother's,” said Red, who had never been told not to talk to wolves. “The little house past the mill, with the blue door.”

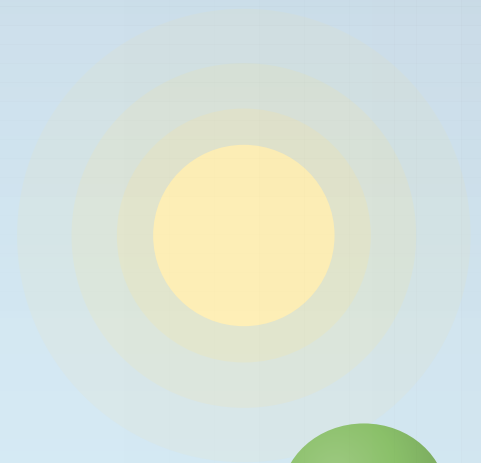

“How lovely,” said the Wolf.

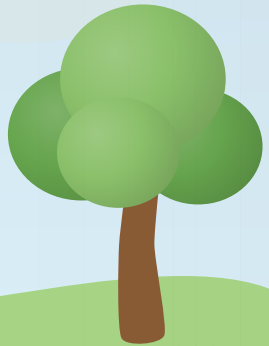

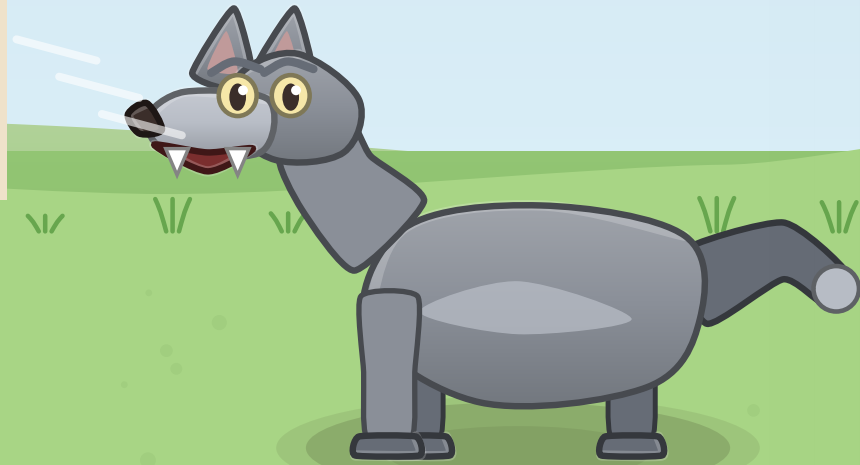

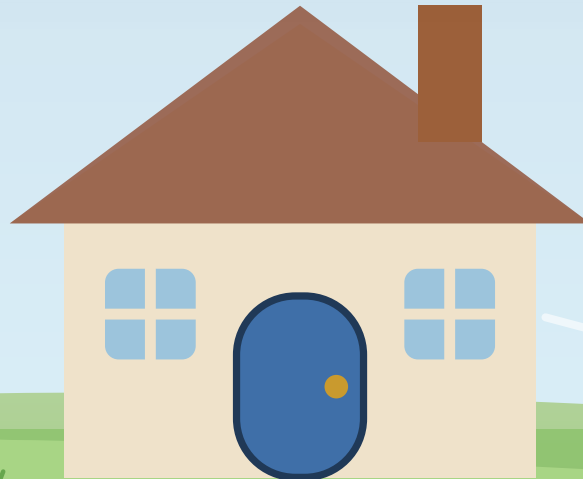

“Look at all these flowers,” he said. “Wouldn't she like some?”
And Red thought that she would, and stepped off the path without noticing that she had.

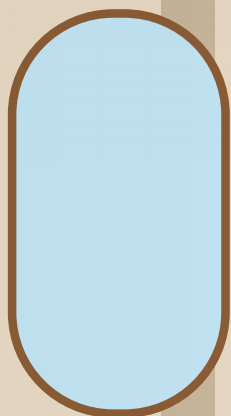

The Wolf went the short way, and ran, and ran, and got there first.

Tap, tap, tap on the blue door.
Grandmother was old but she was not silly. She took one look through the window, hopped out of bed, and shut herself in the wardrobe.

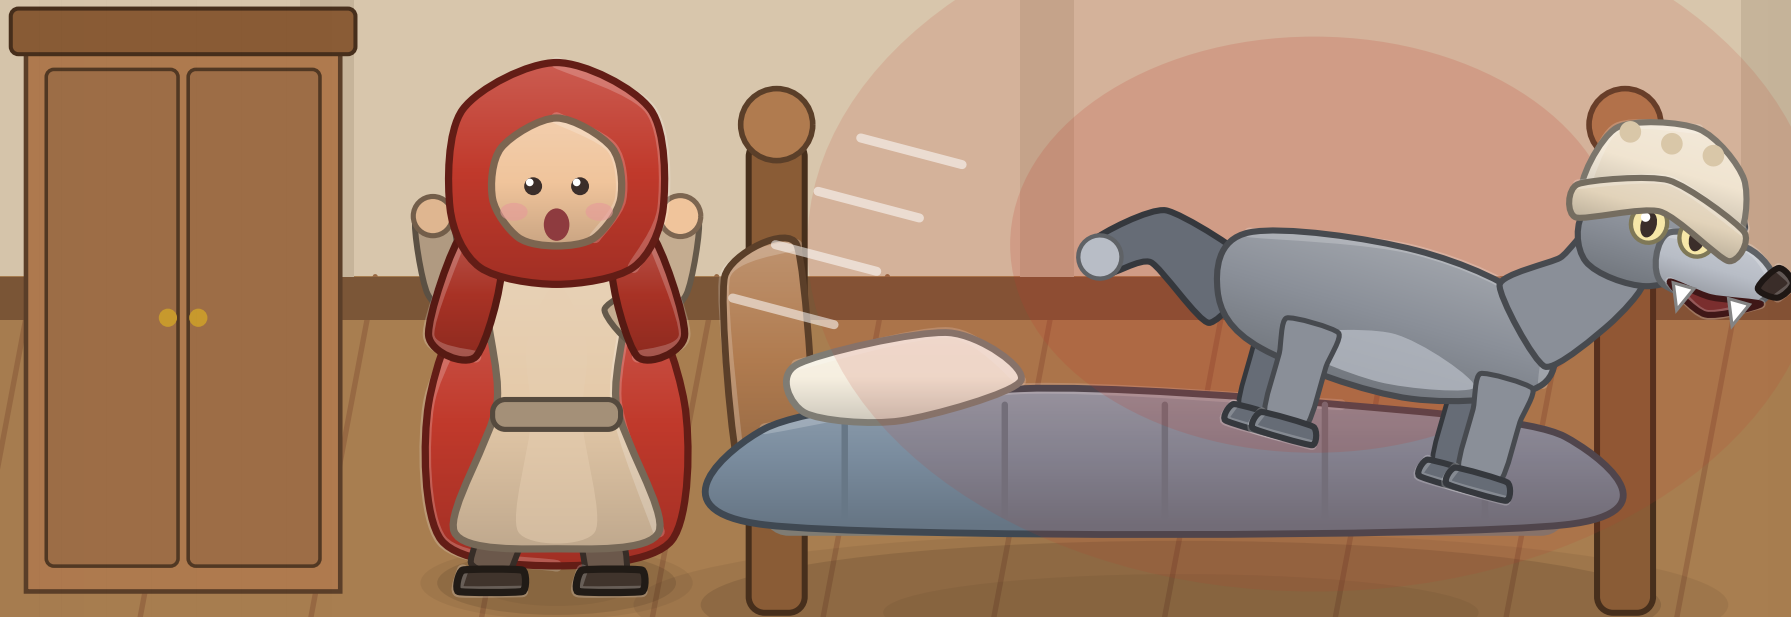

So the Wolf let himself in, and put on her spare cap, and pulled the blanket up to his chin, and lay there feeling extremely pleased with himself.

Red came in with her flowers.
“Grandma,” she said, “what big ears you have.”
“All the better to hear you with, my dear.”

“And Grandma — what big eyes you have.”
“All the better to see you with, my dear.”

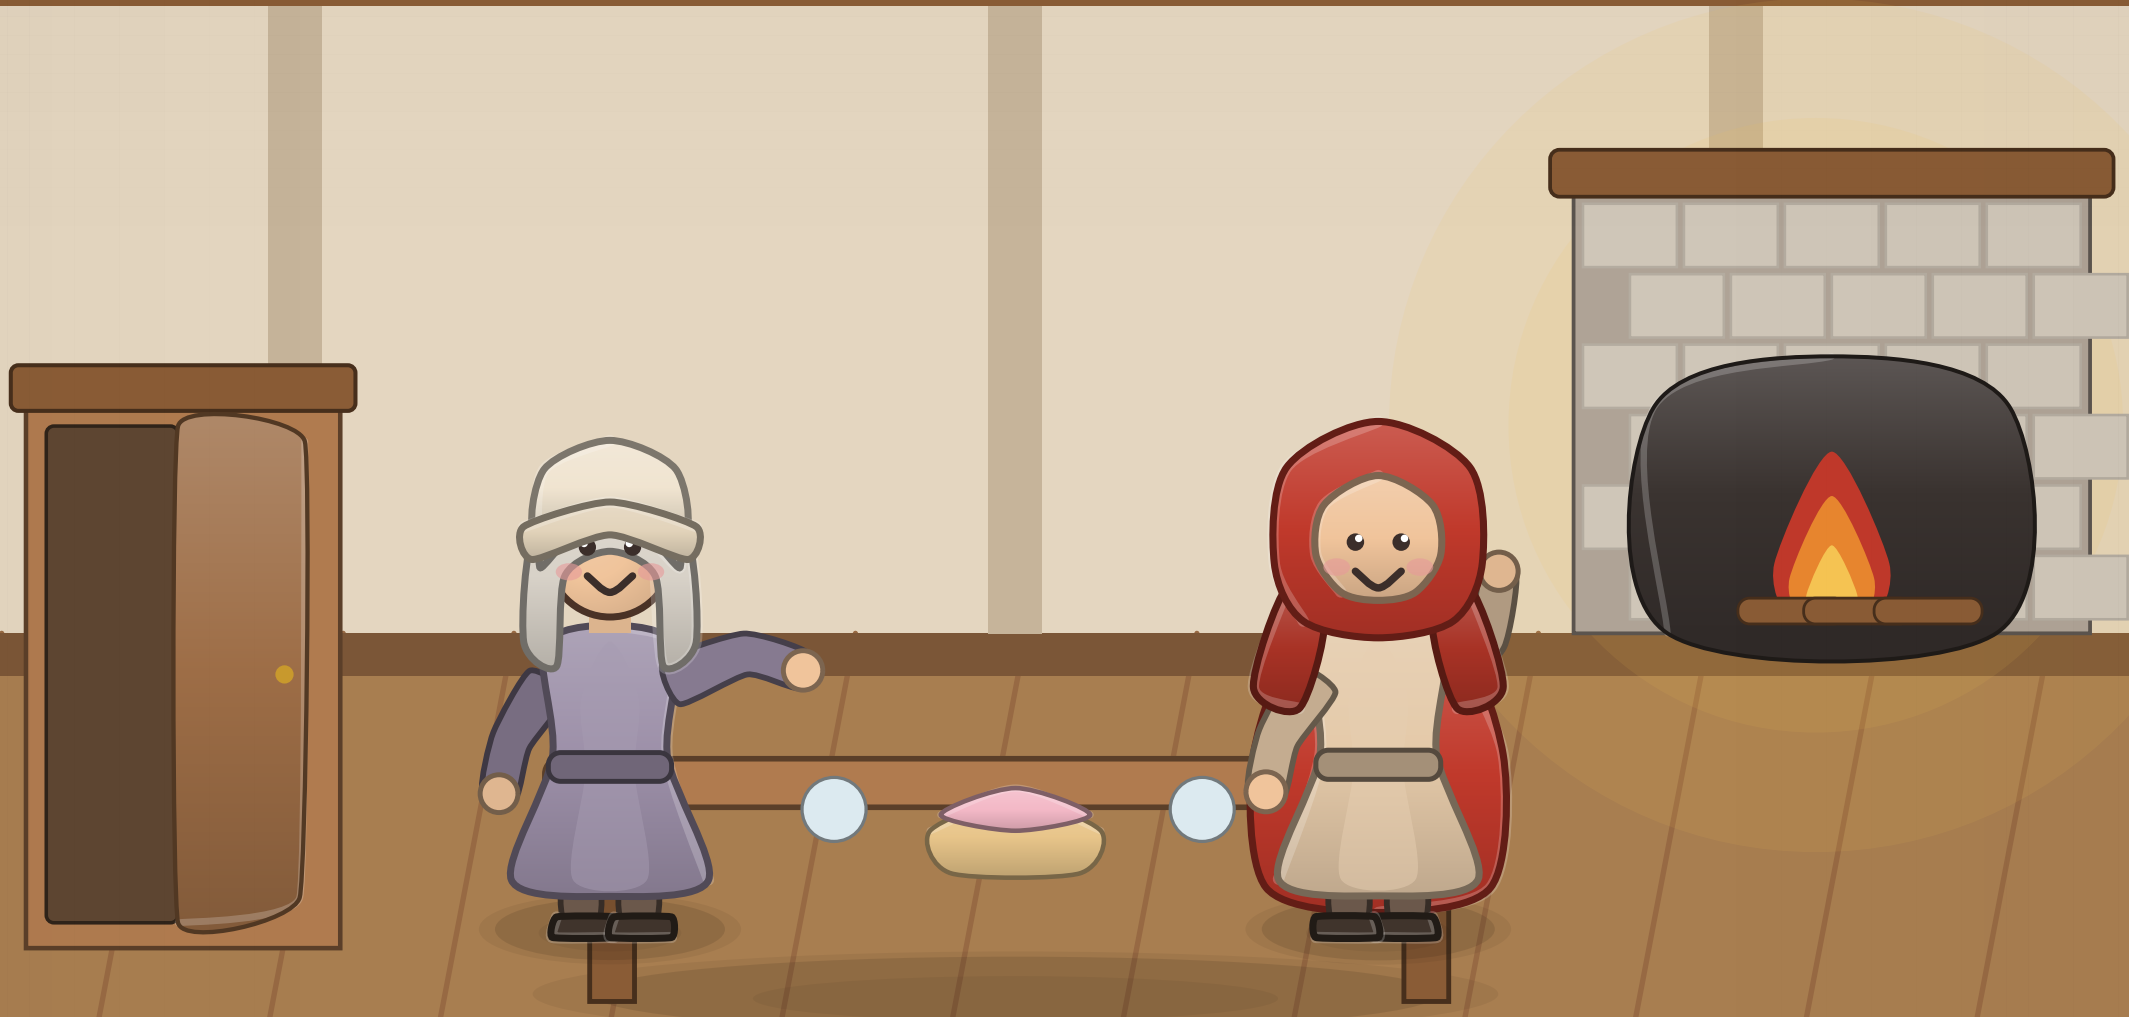

“And Grandma,” said Red, backing towards the door, “what very big teeth you have.”

“ALL THE BETTER TO EAT YOU WITH!” roared the Wolf, and came out of the bed like a thunderstorm.

Red screamed the loudest scream of her life.
A woodcutter working at the end of the lane heard it, and came through that door with his axe before the Wolf had got his second foot on the floor.

The Wolf went out of the window and over the hill and did not stop, and nobody in that wood ever saw him again.
Grandmother came out of the wardrobe. They ate the cake. Red told the story about nine hundred times.

The End

“What big teeth you have!”
“All the better to EAT you with!”
